Abare did quality control and own the 2008 version of the model code and results.

Their staff did the work, it was passed back to abare to independently verify the results and abare signed off on the results and write up in the process.

Abare subsequently used the version themselves.

The 2011 version they did not do or check - but it would be work of a day to verify it etc.

In the recent conversation I agreed they could send us the request - not that we would release code. In the same conversation I confirmed twice that the ip of the gtem model rested with abare - something that agreed with at the time.
