I object to the Mining Tax being repealed on the basis that the loss of income to government revenue is obviously going to be funded by far more vulnerable tax paying Australians that are already struggling to keep afloat financially, especially now with our much higher costs of living. We are only just keeping afloat of the world recession and taxpayers do not need the added financial stress of supporting a government that is not willing to tax a huge industry that helps keeps this country afloat. The back lash will not be economical viable for the government financially nor the citizens of Australia. The mined soil is Australian for the benefits of Australians, who deserve to be compensated for the privilege the mining companies are given to be allowed to mine it. There is no reason for the Mining sector to be exempt from the taxes that all Australians have to pay. It is not right that hard working and struggling Australians are expected to subsidise this rich and lucrative industry.
