This idea of taking some of the money from certain bank customers to prevent Australia's "Big Banks" from going under in bad financial times, really stinks. All four (or five?) big banks have been publicly shown at various times to have been nothing but evil, profit-hungry, criminal-type bastards, no less ---- as you would surely have to admit. I remember a scandal decades ago, about the "Westpac letters," and since then all the others have had to endure very bad press, and some heavy fines, for their Mafia-type slimey activities. How some people, and big business too, can still have anything to do with them, is a real mystery.

I totally support the good old Glass-Steagall (U.S.A.) kind of control on banks, and there is NO DOUBT that what this silly, betrayed country, Australia, needs so much, so badly, is a wonderful, universally beneficial bank, well managed, exactly like the original Commonwealth Bank (not the present rotten bastards.)

Most politicians too, deserve strong condemnation for the various ways they have been content to see Australia go backwards, with FAR TOO MANY foreign takeovers and suicidal policies on trade.

Canberra STINKS, to bloody hell!
