

Australia's superannuation was designed to aid all people to save for the future, that was the noble idea.

However, through successive and deliberate policy changes made over the years - especially by the conservative side of politics - the system now has become skewed in the favor of the more affluent.

It has become yet another tax break and borderline tax rort.

The poor change jobs frequently and are therefore are subject to fee's and easily loose track of their contributions as they navigate a contract based working environment.

The professional white male has been fortunate enough to receive almost continuous full time work since the eighties and it is this cohort along with the wealthy that has become the major beneficiary of the scheme.

Quite simply the poor have paid for the system through fee's and lost super and it has greatly benefited the wealthy in the process.

It has become a twisted national disgrace and further exaggerates the polarity of the rich and poor in modern day Australia.

No-one in their right mind or with any conscience would allow for the continuation of a system that so obviously benefits the wealthy through tax incentives whilst failing the poor through charges and lost super and a lower tax benefit.

It has become yet another mechanism whereby the lucky country has now become slowly but surely the greedy and unfair country.
