

I refer to remarks from the current Treasurer, to the effect that he wants to define a “dignified retirement” for Australians.

Precisely who is he to dictate what we are permitted to live on, in our retirement?

People who have worked hard all their lives, and studied to improve their skills, are perfectly entitled to a substantial superannuation balance, even if it is in the millions. They are entitled to an income and a lifestyle that reflects the position they held in society during their working lives, and after paying a commensurate level of tax in that period.

Frankly how dare he, when we all know that he simply wants to squander peoples’ hard-earned wealth on his dubious social justice programs?
