Hi Callum,

Apologies for the delay in getting back to you.

Please see below response from a government spokesperson.

The Government received the News Media Bargaining Code Review in December and is considering its response. We continue to monitor developments overseas and will consider potential impacts for Australia.

Kind Regards.

To: <media@treasury.gov.au>

Hope you have had a great week.

I am writing about the News Media Bargaining Code with what is playing out in Canada right now for my Monday media section.

I wanted to get a steer from the Treasury on how the government will be treating the next round of negotiations, should parties become more aggressive in their approach as we're seeing overseas, and with all indications suggesting Meta will likely play hard ball this time.

How prominent a role is the government looking to take in the next stages? Considering the Canadian government's moves in the past few days.

Does the government also plan to be more aggressive in potentially designating platforms, should they not find agreements with publishers? And potentially a push for greater transparency in whatever the deals struck contain?

Thanks a lot.

Dear s 22

Thanks for your time last week to meet with Todd Thorpe to discuss digital platforms and international developments particularly regarding ad tech.

I am also hoping you may be able to refer me to the adviser/s in Minister Jones' office regarding the News Media Bargaining Code and other matters being considered by the Government regarding digital platforms eg online scams?

Again, I appreciate your time and attention to these issues. If ever you need to find me, my mobile (below) is always good - call or text.

Subject: AI Yarn
Date: Sunday, 14 May 2023 1:06:01 PM

Hi s 22

As discussed, I'm doing a yarn on calls from the media industry for AI companies to pay compensation for using media content to train their hugely valuable systems that are now starting to power search engines (and are likely to do a heap of other things besides).

This is what Robert Thompson of News Corp said this week:

"...There has been much discussion, some of it enlightened, some not so, about the potential impact of generative AI and there is no doubt that it will profoundly affect the media business - candidly, generative AI may pose a challenge to our intellectual property and to the future of journalism. As those who have experimented with ChatGPT will be aware, the answers are only as insightful and factual as the source material and are more retrospective than contemporary.

Given those precepts, we see three areas in which our content will be used by generative AI creators, whose products will be enhanced by our IP, for which we should be compensated: Firstly, our content will inevitably be used, as has already exploited, to train AI engines; secondly, specific examples of our content will be surfaced in response to users' AI queries; and, thirdly and crucially, our content will certainly be aggregated and synthesized, and those answers monetized by other parties - we expect our fair share of that monetization. Generative AI cannot be degenerative AI.

And this is Nine boss Mike Sneesy, also this week:

There is a risk obviously, that our content could be exploited by AI platforms to generate value. That really isn't greatly different to the challenge that we have today with Google and Facebook and other social media platforms that already are generating value from our content. And for which the news media bargaining code that the government put in place was an important baseline for us to negotiate commercial arrangements and effectively protect our IP. So on that front, I think it's very important that we continue to work closely with the government around expanding that view of news media bargaining into a broader content, not just text and images, but also audio, video, and any form of IP that we create. And again, I think the government has demonstrated that they understand how much this [AI and social media IP theft] can damage local media and as said as I said before, the fact that our business is built around creating unique, differentiated, but also expensive content in this marketplace.

Is the government examining extending the news media bargaining code to AI companies?
Is it considering extending it to non-news content?

Either way, why?

On a principled level, should AI companies be able to harvest data from Australian firms without permission or payment?

Any other comment?

Thanks,

Nick

Good afternoon,

I write media for The Sydney Morning Herald and The Age and am working on a few things related to Meta and Google. I am wondering if the Treasury has finished its report on the news media bargaining code as I was told from a few different parties it had still not been given to the Assistant Treasurer's office. If it is incomplete, can I ask if it will be finished before the end of the year?

My deadline is 12pm Sunday.

Dear Minister and Diary Manager,

Further to my call just now, I would like to follow-up this meeting request.

Mr Miller would appreciate being able to meet during this non-sitting period.

As outlined previously, the matter of the news media bargaining code is the subject of the meeting, with both the Government review of the Code (and submissions) and forward looking renewals particularly topical.

Also noteworthy, other developments in the space (but not specific to the news media bargaining code) include the use of journalism in generative AI (training, surfacing and synthesising).

s 47F , Mr Miller's EA, is copied on this email for ease of arranging a mutually suitable time.

Kind regards
