

Winding down Australia's cheques system is a very poorly thought out idea. It will create a lot of difficulty and worry for many people and small clubs and organisations. There are many country areas that do not have a regular and reliable internet coverage to enable people to change to electronic banking successfully. There are many country towns that do not have a bank at all because the banks have closed their branches and withdrawn their services from these country areas.

For the people and the clubs and organisations in these areas paying their bills by cheque is still the safest and simplest way to transfer their money.

In this day and age of increasing cyber hacking the incidence of people having their money stolen by cyber thieves is increasing daily. It is still the simplest and safest way for people to pay their bills by a crossed NOT NEGOTIABLE cheque that can only be paid into the nominated account.

Frank Barnes