

Regional banking problems and solution

Living in a remote rural area is vastly different to living in a city where all necessary services are generally taken for granted.

However, of recent times, rural Australians have been progressively deprived of essential services such as banking by the big banks causing much hardship to people in many small towns with no alternative replacement facility available. I strongly suggest that the simple, cost effective, and convenient answer to this issue is to provide an Australian Peoples Bank available through their local Australian Post Office. you should bear in mind these people are mostly people that produce food to supply large population centres and to loose their services in this regard would be a tragedy. Just because they are living in a rural area in no way diminishes their importance as valuable members of the Australian community and they need and deserve the services that are taken so much for granted in larger population areas.

yours Sincerely,

Roger Hall
